sanitory purposes. In one place an in ventor makes a loom and weaves the mosintricate and beautiful patterns; in another place an inventor constructs a machine which performs the most delicate needle work, and at once relieves woman from the most tedious and confining household drudgery. We might mention many other important inventions whiel are now conferring blessings upon community, but our object principally, is to direct attention to their merits, as particelar information can be obtained res becting their nature and operations by examining the columns of the Scientific American. What we hope from community is not to forget living inventors; let them have, their reward while they are with us. It is too often the case that naare dead after having allowed them to suffer and die in penuty. It is exceedingly easy to pass compliments to deceas ed benefactors, because such praise costs nothing.
